Protecting Key Lion Prey Species and Habitat in South Sudan

The two-week survey, which spanned several national parks, including Boma and Badingilo National Park, revealed that South Sudan is home to nearly six million antelope--a staggering number of wildlife and a crucial food source for the country's large lion population.

Rescue Sudan Lions

In a heartwarming rescue mission, eleven lions that endured the ravages of conflict in Sudan have found a new lease on life at LIONSROCK Big Cat Sanctuary. These majestic big cats, caught in the crossfire of war, witnessed great trials and tragedies while trapped in their war-torn country of origin.

Badingilo & Boma , African Parks

Situated in the south of South Sudan, Badingilo and Boma national parks make up nearly three million hectares and form an integral part of the larger 20-million-hectare ecosystem that stretches through the Jonglei corridor and to the White Nile.

South Sudan, the Last Frontier for Africa's Lions

From a lion conservation perspective, South Sudan is the last frontier. Less is known about lions in South Sudan than in any other range state. The country is emerging from decades of civil war, and little is known about what of the country's natural resources made it through those torrid times.

Rescued Sudan lions find new home in South Africa

Now, eleven lions were transferred to LIONSROCK Big Cat Sanctuary in South Africa on 16 February, ready to start their new life. The lions spent nine months surrounded by the tragedies of war. They are traumatised, weak, emaciated, and prone to injury. They responded positively to the treatment and care they received in the last weeks.

The lion, the wish and the warthog - King of the beasts caught on

The global population remaining in the wild is estimated at just 20,000, a 90% fall within the past century. Most of the surviving subpopulations are small and fragmented, but western South Sudan - with its large tracts of uninterrupted habitat - has the potential to be a key stronghold for the species.
