Many European companies across various sectors, including automotive (like Volvo, BMW, and Dacia), luxury goods (like Richemont), pharmaceuticals, and technology (like ASML, Infineon, and Siemens), produce in China to leverage its dominant position in global manufacturing, supply. Many European companies across various sectors, including automotive (like Volvo, BMW, and Dacia), luxury goods (like Richemont), pharmaceuticals, and technology (like ASML, Infineon, and Siemens), produce in China to leverage its dominant position in global manufacturing, supply chains, and market. EU firms in China face low profits, rising pressure and reduced expansion, prompting strategy shifts and calls for stronger EU support. Nearly a decade's worth of panel data from European Union Chamber of Commerce in China business confidence surveys are used to analyse the deteriorating outlooks. China is an important market for European investors in many ways. European companies tend to have more international exposure than their US peers. China's impressive economic growth over recent decades has created huge market opportunities for European companies. European companies need to adapt to. The latest wave of investment and trade initiatives aims to bolster China's position as a major global economic power, not only through trade agreements but also by fostering strategic alliances and increasing its technological influence in the region. China has long been one of Europe's largest.
